

The Season of Letting Go

Lisa Harper Harper

There is something about autumn that speaks to the soul. Perhaps it's the way the leaves slowly change their colors, turning ordinary landscapes into extraordinary works of art. Or maybe it's the gentle reminder that even the most beautiful things must eventually let go.

Fall teaches us that change is a natural part of life. The leaves don't fight to remain green, nor do they cling to the branches when their season has passed. Instead, they surrender to the process, trusting what comes next.

If only we could learn to do the same.

As we journey through life, we sometimes hold on to things long after their season has ended. Old disappointments, painful memories, expectations that never came to fruition, and even relationships that have run their course. We hold on because letting go can be difficult. It's familiar to carry yesterday into today, even when the weight becomes too heavy.

But perhaps autumn is God's gentle reminder that letting go isn't always a loss.

Sometimes, it's an act of faith.

The trees may appear bare for a season, but beneath the surface, life is quietly preparing for what comes next. What looks like an ending is simply part of a greater cycle, one we cannot always understand while we're standing in the middle of it.

Our own lives have seasons, too. There are times of growth, times of abundance, and times when life asks us to slow down, reflect, and release what no longer belongs in the next chapter.

With age comes the realization that not everything deserves our energy, not every burden is ours to carry, and not every unanswered question needs an immediate explanation. Sometimes peace comes when we stop trying to control every outcome and trust God with the things beyond our reach.

So, as we see the autumn leaves continue to fall, perhaps we can take a lesson from the trees. We can release what weighs heavily on our hearts, make room for new beginnings, and trust that even when life looks a little bare, something beautiful may be taking shape beneath the surface.

After all, we don't have to understand every season to appreciate its purpose.

Maybe the beauty of fall isn’t just in the changing leaves, but in the quiet reminder that we, too, can let go with grace, trust the process, and have faith in what lies ahead.
